Comparative Legal Institutions
LAW 4320/101 [41048] - CRS
In Person Closed
Course
Total Enrollment: 0/0

This course is designed to examine a range of legal institutions from a comparative and interdisciplinary perspective. It is not a traditional course in comparative law in that it focuses not so much on particular rules of substantive law but on the structure of different legal systems and the consequences of those structural differences for law and society. In particular, we will focus on the economic impact of legal traditions. Readings will be drawn from legal and social science literature, including works from anthropology, economics, political science and sociology. The course will explicitly cover non-Western legal traditions to an extent not found in conventional comparative law courses. Furthermore, American institutions are explicitly included in the comparison: this is not simply a course in foreign law. Assessment is by a three-hour take-home exam. There is an option to write a research paper sufficient to fulfill the substantial writing requirement. LL.M. second-year and third-year students can exercise this option freely but only a limited number of first-year students may avail themselves of it. Participation may be considered in final grading.

Registration and the Bidding Process

• What is bidding?

The bidding system allows students to rank classes in order of most desired to least desired. Changes can be made and saved within the system while it is open. All bids must be in prior to the time the system closes. Once the system closes, an algorithm runs to assign classes to students. The system also can create waitlists if you don’t get into your top choice(s) (for 1L electives only).
